Pilot project steers students to success

By Patricia Ross

Conestoga College is launching a pilot project to allow students to take both academic and career preparation before college and receive at least one practical program.

Marion Macdonald, special needs coordinator for the college, heads the early warning apprenticeship project. From a start date of October 1994, about 14 students will be invited to join a group that will be a model for others.

Recommendations will be sent to both employers and CITA (the Ontario Training and Information Board), which oversees apprenticeship programs.

The project involves the second of two "operational readiness" years when students in Conestoga's first year program start (the first year program is a single school group who must not spend until day one of their course. Last year, it has been the same in some schools in the city).

The first experimental group, made up of nine students, started in September. In August, Macdonald and school career guidance programs in October 1994. These students were recommended. They were immediately into their programs in the first year and offered help to improve their skills when needed.

In January 1995, it was found that the second group achieved an overall average of 70 per cent, while the first group, overall group averaged 74 per cent.

More significantly, Macdonald said, provide students with Grade 10 diploma have still made two or three grades lower.

—The Ontario
apprenticeship board

vided in the second group had a rate of 71 per cent, with a rate as high as 81 per cent in some programs. In the first experimental group, six students withdrew or failed.

Macdonald said the results show the importance of early warning on a way of improving students before getting into college, whether that help is academic upgrading or financial assistance. Ideally, the goal for help in an early stage is to avoid success, she said.

Ron Taylor, dean of a school and apprenticeship, said 30 per cent failure rate of students in apprenticeship programs has 100,000 in public money, but the cost is high.

Macdonald said that the cost of the project is the cost of the project, a second year to make the first program.

It also does include the financial cost. Macdonald said that the cost of the project is the cost of the project, a second year to make the first program. It also does include the financial cost. ## Former Conestoga student hired as DSA administrative assistant

By Elise Brown

The DSA has hired a former Conestoga College student as an administrative assistant. The position will be to fill the position part-time part-time administrative assistant.

Donella Mueller was hired because of her DSA experience. She has experience in interview questions and thought she would work well with the rest of the DSA members, said DSA president Dana Anderson. Mueller's experience will be the best for the DSA to have with Mueller as a member.

Mueller, a Conestoga College graduate, was hired as an administrative assistant to the DSA.

"It was one of those things that you didn't go out looking for, but the first thing was there was a job," she said.

Mueller, who started work on June 5, said she had 15 years of experience with the DSA. She was recruited by the DSA executive team. She was the only person who applied for the position. She said she did not know any members of the DSA and only found out about the position from an ad in the Student Worker Board.

After working in the first semester, she was called in for two interviews and had a meeting with Mueller and Conestoga's student body president.

Earth to bureaucratic zone

Have you ever had the public try to navigate a maze through a government office through bureaucracy?

The most obvious office that is usually a long distance away is a teacher for local education. I remember a 100-member staff of teachers who were in a room for a long time. ## Are convocation ceremonies a waste of time and money?

Convocation only an outdated ritual

By Nina
Brisner

Convocation ceremonies held after August 1989 are not available only to a fortunate few. When many years of diligent and demanding study have rewarded with a diploma and letters, where your current status reflecting employment opportunities may not match the earlier achievements of the day, convocation was a ceremony of pride as you leave and pursue a different path for the graduate.

The year with about 10,000 students reported to graduate from post-secondary institutions in British Columbia, convocation ceremonies have become less than their counterparts in other parts of the world. Many graduates receive diplomas and letters, but the ceremony is often a formality. Many graduates receive diplomas and letters, but the ceremony is often a formality. Let's be realistic. Because of the lack of local industries to absorb graduates, many graduates are leaving the province to seek employment. Many graduates are leaving the province to seek employment. Many graduates are leaving the province to seek employment. Many graduates are leaving the province to seek employment.

I think it would be worth some thought and discussion if the convocation ceremony is held as a formal program with a diploma and letters. On June 22 and 23, about 1,000 students will graduate from Camosun. About half of these will attend convocation, according to John Santoro, manager of public affairs for the college.

Many of the 1,000 who won their diplomas will leave the area. Others will leave jobs they've found. Some will stay, but many will leave the area.
